

It is announced that Senator Pendleton, of this state, has been elected to the post of president of the National Association of Manufacturers, a position of great importance. Mr. Pendleton, who has been a member of the association since its organization, was elected by a large majority of the members. He is a well-known manufacturer and a prominent public figure in Oregon. His election is a reflection of the high regard in which he is held by his fellow manufacturers.

Mr. Pendleton's new scheme, put forth under the name of the Oregon Transcontinental Company, attracts the attention of investors in America and Europe. The plan is to build a great railway line across the continent, from the Pacific to the Atlantic. It is a bold and ambitious project, and if successful, it would revolutionize transportation in the United States. Mr. Pendleton is confident that his plan will be successful, and he is working hard to secure the necessary funds to carry it out.

Mr. Pendleton is a great old fool and a great success. The other day he read over the list of his former slaves and found that a different thing from calling the roll of his slaves was to call the roll of his slaves. He was a slave owner, and he was a great success. He was a great old fool, and he was a great success. He was a slave owner, and he was a great success.

What then, is the necessity, or utility, of the measure? It is the necessity of the country. It is the necessity of the country. It is the necessity of the country. It is the necessity of the country. It is the necessity of the country.

It is curious to observe that the measure which Mr. Pendleton proposes is a revival of an early practice. The measure is a revival of an early practice. The measure is a revival of an early practice. The measure is a revival of an early practice. The measure is a revival of an early practice.

General Grant, in a long talk with a representative of the New York Times, says that he observed strictly the rule of "senatorial courtesy" throughout the whole of his term. He is a well-known figure in American history, and his words carry great weight. He is a well-known figure in American history, and his words carry great weight.
